SUMMARY

During the Golden Age, Immortal Technology supported an international charitable medical network that extended healthcare access beyond Misty Island. This review describes the forms of assistance the network provided and how each is recorded. The network is a historical programme and does not accept applications.

01 Purpose

The international network belonged to a broader period of medical and institutional opening on Misty Island. Its purpose was to extend healthcare access beyond the island, bringing pharmaceutical knowledge, charitable resources and clinical relationships into closer connection. It was not a medical-travel service.

02 Three routes of assistance

The network's work is recorded along three separate routes: direct treatment support; medicines and technical materials; and support for the clinical capacity of receiving institutions. Each route served a different unit of benefit, and the archive does not combine them into a single impact figure.

03 Units of care

A consultation, an episode of treatment, a course of medicines, a period of training and a referral are not interchangeable. Recording each in its own unit makes clear what was provided and how responsibility passed between institutions. Anonymised care pathways and supply registers are kept for this reason; no identifiable patient information is published.

04

Access and recovery

Improved access can be shown through simpler administration, delivered medicines, completed appointments and sustained support for local clinical teams. Recovery is a different claim: it requires a diagnosis, a defined outcome and adequate follow-up. This review reports access and makes no claim about individual recoveries.

05

A historical programme

The network operated during the Golden Age, from 1997, and is presented here as part of the company's history. It is not an active charitable service, and enquiries about it cannot be treated as applications for assistance.

> Recovery is a different claim: it requires a diagnosis, a defined outcome and adequate follow-up.

SCOPE OF THIS REVIEW

This document is a historical review prepared from the corporate archive. It does not identify countries, receiving institutions or numbers of beneficiaries.

This document is provided as general corporate information. It describes historical programmes and does not constitute medical advice, an offer of treatment or assistance, or an application process.
